Call of Duty co-founder claims Activision put "very awkward pressure" on Infinity Ward to make a game about Iran invading Israel.

The developers declined to do so.

We don't need Activision to do it. They did it along time ago with Battlefield 3. Go look for yourself or ask Grok.

If you want to know who controls you just look at who you cannot question or critique.

This is a video game, not real life. This doesn't exist. Yet, somehow, this subject is too hot to handle. We're occupied.

there's a genuinely complicated conversation here about where the line sits between creative exploration of geopolitical themes and exploitation of real conflicts involving real people.

Call of Duty has always walked that line uncomfortably. an Iran invades Israel game would have landed in a minefield that no amount of "fictional setting" disclaimers could navigate then, the developer was discarded, not due to 'Z' but "controversial" = West Asians are gonna 'backlash'.

Making the new shooting game in the set of West Asia, but invading Israel.

Decisions like this define a studio's legacy more than any sales figure.

Refusing 'awkward pressure' is the ultimate stress-test for a team's creative integrity. Technical excellence starts with a solid moral foundation, not just clean code
