

Trump Downplayed Teachers 'Having Sex' With Students in 2012

Trump: "I don't see a lot of damage being done."

In a June 2012 interview with Extra at Miss USA, pageant co-owner Donald Trump was asked about cases of female teachers having sex with underage male students. Trump downplayed the seriousness, saying, "I don't think the male students have been hurt by it. In fact, they're going around bragging about it as I understand it. So, you know, I don't see a lot of damage done."

Trump: "I don't see a lot of damage done."

Trump called it an "unusual situation" and added, "I would say her husband cannot be happy."

These remarks resurfaced in October 2016 amid heightened scrutiny over Trump's history of comments and allegations about his behavior toward women and minors. The resurfacing came just days after the release of the Access Hollywood tape, CBS footage of Trump making a suggestive remark to a 10-year-old girl in 1992, and a New York Times report featuring two women accusing him of groping.

Trump's campaign dismissed the Times story as "fiction" and a politically motivated attack. These 2012 comments of Trump downplaying the sexually assault of minors by those in power are a reminder that Trump refuses to release the unredacted Epstein files.

His administration claims that they couldn't identify any clients and wouldn't be making any arrests either. Instead, Trump has been attacking his base and calling the ordeal "a hoax."
